The composition of a representative computer simulation to embody and test a number of recent conceptual advances in coordinating autonomous systems is proposed. The underlying aim is to explore the aggregation of ideas in communications resource assignment, control and coordination, and to delineate the distinction between global and local subproblems. The purpose of this research is to explore the feasibility via formulation and simulation in developing a convincing example of vehicle coordination via communication.